WHAT MAKES GREAT CITIES?"-The question is often asked why it in that such and such a town is improving so very rapidly in point of wealth, position, population, &c. The ques-tion is easily answered, and should strike every one at once, and with force. Manufactories are built up and sustained; citizens generally co-operate with each other; a spirit of enteris stimulated; there are no jealousies or bickerings; merchants and business endeavor to give satisfaction in all of their transactions; trade flows to them from every section, and, consequently, men of capital and enterprise writer to the Peteraburg Express says:

Marcha Mergan, the prisoner, was indigent, but provertially honest. Through her own exerctions, and the kindness of a few neighbors, she supported her little family. Some months since, Allen, the constable, forcibly entered her abode, and levied on the effects of her solved in a constable, for the pressure of selling the same. She remonetrated and importuned him to desist. Regardless of her emonetrated and importuned him to desist the first and price vision and pointed in the mean of the results of the executive of the results of the resul to desist. Regardless of her entreaties, he persisted in taking possession of her furniture, and added insult to injury by heaping upon her a volley of abuse. Being without a protector, and feeling deeply aggrieved, in a moment of trenzy she seized a shot gun and shot her persecutor down. The jury having come into Court, rendered a verdict of "Not Gullty."

The result was received by an immense consultation of visitors with one universal outburst of following magning between the nours of time and
